

ABSTRACT OF THE DISCLOSURE

Dot spacers, which are disposed between two transparent electrodes of a touch panel, are colored differently from one another and appropriately distributed so that the dot spacers are perceived by a viewer as representing a designed image pattern by color distinction, rather than just a geometric or random pattern. As a result, the viewer does not feel the pattern as annoying even if the dot spacers are noticeable or visible to the viewer.